Council Directs McDonald To Include Youth Center Fund In Next Budget

Financing of a new Youth Center building for Greenbelt will be included in next year's proposed budget, the city council decided last Monday night. At the urging of councilman James Smith, the council agreed to direct city manager Charles McDonald to present several alternate plans of financing a new home for the city's teen-agers.

Smith first presented a petition, bearing 500 signatures and the support of nine local groups, which requested the city to appropriate $9000 for two consecutive years. This amount would be added to $2000 already in the Youth Center fund to build a $20,000 Center. The structure (for this amount of money) was not considered adequate for the needs at present, but "would be a start" for something better at a later date.

The petition stated that the $9000 would not appreciably affect the city tax rate; Smith explained that savings made this year by using county services and other means would provide more than enough to offset the requested sum.

Mayor Thomas Canning and McDonald disagreed with Smith, declaring it would affect the tax rate. "We must maintain a low tax rate in order to encourage new development," Canning said. McDonald stated that a bond issue might be the best method of financing a new building, and would have less effect on the tax rate.

Beverly Fonda, chairman of the Youth Center Advisory Board, reminded the council that the youth group is diminishing in size because of the lack of "their own" building. "Even though we may have the best dance floor in the county," Fonda declared, "the youth miss the feeling of having a place of their own."

Alan Kistler, councilman, said that he was sure all councilmen wanted a new building, but the problem was "method." He suggested that several alternate plans be included in the budget for 1956, and the matter would be settled during the budget consideration. The council agreed.

Council Approves Agenda Publicity

Publication of city council agendas in the News Review will begin soon, as the city council approved spending sums for this purpose last Monday night. The city also directed City Manager Charles McDonald to include an appropriate sum in next year's proposed budget for the printing and publication of ordinances and resolutions passed by the city council.

Councilmen James Smith, Robert Hurst and Alan Kistler spoke for the proposal, citing the need for increased flow of information to citizens and the poor display site used at present (the post office bulletin board).

Isadore Parker, present News Review editor, declared that the paper, like the city manager, is seeking all legitimate means of revenue. He said publication of proper ordinances, agendas, and other civic information is a responsibility of the council.

City manager McDonlad stated he wasn't sure that the News Review was the best place to publish the material, and suggested that the city might publish its own vehicle of information. Parker supported the latter move. "I am only interested in seeing that the citizens get news of council activities . . . if the city could do that, it would take a load off my shoulders."

Addition of the sum needed in next year's budget will be considered, along with other items which are subject to revision, elimination or increase during budget deliberations.

Council Donates Money To Nat'l Guard Fund

A "battalion fund" for members of the local National Guard unit was swelled $250 by the city council last Monday night, after a request by Frank Riley was made for the city to participate. The money will go towards merit awards for battalion members who earn them.

"They will be given theater tickets, or season passes to the Redskins games or a trophy . . ." Riley declared.

GVHC Board Hears Predictions Of Development Within Two Years

The board meeting of the Greenbelt Veteran Housing Corporation October 29 heard flat predictions by board member Frank Lastner of big construction work completed here in Greenbelt within the next two years.

Lastner and GVHC manager Paul Campbell were reporting to the board on a conference earlier that day with Harry Shaw, chief engineer of the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, and developer-builder Joseph Kanter on the problem of local sewage disposal facilities and their effect on community expansion.

Lastner reported that Shaw assured Kanter of WSSC sewage lines for housing units to be built by Warner-Kanter on undeveloped land bought from GVHC, and that the lines would be available beginning in the spring of 1957. And, Lastner added, should Greenbelt's city council reach an early decision on whether to expand the present sewage disposal plant or tie into WSSC lines, the lines might come in by the fall of 1956.

Shaw was said to have indicated his belief that the state would permit a temporary overloading of the present Greenbelt plant until WSSC lines become available. He contemplates an arrangement whereby WSSC would pay the city 7 cents per thousand gallons to handle sewage from Kanter-built homes within WSSC territory in Greenbelt. The contemplated overload would not be dangerous, the board was told, as the processing would merely be inferior to that under standards now adhered to by the city. State permission for the overload would be conditioned on the situation being temporary, a matter of no more than a year or so.

Lastner also told the GVHC board of a recent prediction by Jack Pollin, one of the developers of the planned industrial park along the B&O railroad tracks in the far northwestern area of Greenbelt property; Pollin stated to the county commissioners, of whom Lastner is one, that within two years a $20 million development will have been installed there.

Kanter was reported to have compared his development tempo in Greenbelt to a railroad express: right now he was moving cautiously, because the go-ahead signals hadn't been flashed, but preparations are under way and when the go-ahead is flashed great speed would be shown.

Questioned by the News-Review reporter, Lastner sought to ease apprehension as to whether sufficient school capacity would be available to meet new pupil loads generated by the Warner-Kanter homes. Citing the $6 million in school bonds issued and the additional $9 million bonding capacity authorized for the county by the recent state legislative session, Lastner added that the county assistant superintendent of schools in charge of this phase of the system had assured him that the school construction schedule is flexible; if Greenbelt develops a need for more classrooms ahead of one of the communities presently listed for a new school, Greenbelt would get the new school construction first.

Other board meeting developments:

1. With all nine members present and voting unanimously, the board after discussion approved Percy Andros' motion to contribute $125 to the Greenbelt armory dedication fund. The donation was approved because of the benefits the Armory would bring to GVHC membership, and because it would be a non-recurring item. It was stipulated that this approval not be a precedent when other organizations solicit funds.

2. Approval of 13 new applicants for membership in GVHC was voted.

3. Campbell told the board that the Public Housing Administration was perturbed when it read about projected plans for setting up a system whereby members leaving town could more easily sell their homes via financing aids to would-be buyers. PHA officials called him in for a briefing. The agency hadn't been aware of the need and was worried about possible jeopardy to GVHC's financial structure, Campbell said, but after his explanation of the program under consideration the officials seemed reassured. The proposal includes use of a separate corporate set-up.

4. Campbell also reported on conversation under way on the proposed system whereby GVHC might get bank financing and PHA approval for a building, some or all of which would be leased to the U.S. Post Office Department for a local post office. The possibility was mentioned that the Greenbelt municipal offices might be in the same building, if the city council makes its plans in time.
